So I would like to write a test method to be able to confirm that there are no crash scenarios possible. The test method should only use the core data model, so that it does not crash on the simulator of the later iOS versions. A scenario to test is: I have a "project" core data entity with a "name" attribute, and I populate it with an "someName" string. If someone simply changes the model of the existing project, it should be persisted with the "someName" string. I have managed to write a test which allows me to make a model update and immediately check that it didn't crash, but I am wondering how I could do the same test with the "name" attribute only. Thanks. A: So you're using the Core Data model within your app to define your entity model, so you'll have to be able to access the actual instance of the Core Data managed object model class that you defined in the code you've written, and you'll have to be able to call its methods, etc. So if you want to test certain attributes of your managed object model class, you'll have to make an instance of your managed object model class in memory and feed it the data you'd like to test it with, and then call methods on this instance, one attribute at a time, in a test. To accomplish this with a custom class, you can do one of two things: 1) Keep a static "helper" array of all attributes of the class, and call instance methods on the class with the data for each attribute, one at a time, in the test. 2) Use reflection and dynamic runtime binding to call attribute methods on your managed object model class, accessing it and its attributes at runtime. Option 2 is much easier to do and will be much less prone to error than doing it with option 1, but the way you'll have to do that is by adding a class extension to your Core Data managed object model class, and adding a method called "attributeFor
