I have set the passive request timeout value to 60. Now, let's say the initial message comes into the queue, with publish time in the future. Now, after 60 minutes it is expiring, and it doesn't go into dead-letter-queue, but is still stuck in the queue. As my broker is configured with the passive request timeout set to 60, I can't get the message from the queue. My question is, how can I get the expired message from the queue using the ActiveMQ client? My client is using the java AMQ client. Thanks! A: The default passive request timeout for messages in a queue is 10 seconds. (The default passive request timeout for topics is 60 seconds.) If the message was deleted or timed out while in the queue, it was automatically redirected to the DLQ. You could change this timeout but I would recommend waiting until the messages have been removed from the queue. You would use the ActiveMQ.DLQ.getMessageCount() method to find out how many messages are sitting there. You would then need to check if the message has expired, and if not, retrieve it. Britain's Future: A Team of "Pioneering Workers" Last night's BBC Newsnight showed a report on the state of British manufacturing, a subject I have been aware of for some time but without much awareness until I read the report. Since at least the dawn of the industrial revolution workers have been and continue to be an integral part of the nation's economy, playing a central role in improving the quality of its citizens' lives and improving its productivity. A variety of business have maintained production sectors, but it seems certain that the sector will begin to decline again and that it will no longer play a central role in the economy. The cause of this decline has not been explained, just noted, and its impact will be
